

Place a James B. Hunt Jr.
Library memory here.

HUNT LIBRARY, designed with the user in mind, offers many comfortable seating areas for long-term studying, study group meetings and just reading a good book. Photo contributed by Roger Winstead.

studying for the future

STUDENTS FIND AN EXCUSE TO STUDY JUST TO VISIT NEW LIBRARY

The Hunt Library, located on Centennial Campus, is named after the former North Carolina Governor James Baxter Hunt Jr., a proud N. C. State alumni and former two term Student Body President. After opening in January 2013, Hunt Library became the University's second main library. Hunt Library was designed to be one of the most technologically sophisticated learning spaces in the world, and includes several excellent features keeping NC State on the cutting edge of new age technology. The library is over 221,000 square feet, and stands 88 feet high at its tallest point. Key features of the Hunt Library include almost 100 group study rooms and technology-equipped spaces, dramatic views of Lake Raleigh, and the BookBot. The BookBot is an automated book delivery system that can hold up to 2 million volumes.

Like other libraries in the NSCU Library system, students can check out books, textbooks, movies, video games, and wide variety of electronic devices. Unlike other libraries, Hunt includes fully equipped Media Production Studios, Music Rooms, Usability Lab, and Makerspace. The Hunt Library also has its own café, the Common Grounds Café offers coffee, muffins, sandwiches, cookies, and the world famous Howling Cow ice cream.